Staff Summary of Public Testimony:

(In support) Livestock and dairy are two key industries that make up Washington's agriculture industry. Data entry is one piece in the big picture of animal disease traceability. While it is very important to those industries that we have a robust animal identification program, the question of how to equitably distribute the costs associated with the data entry of regulatory forms needs to be addressed. Currently, documents are submitted to the Washington State Department of Agriculture (Department) in paper form, and there is a strong desire to make the move to electronic forms. The basis of this bill is to provide a financial incentive to move producers and practitioners toward electronic form data entry and processing, thus removing the duplicative human element. The Department has been working with producers and will soon have some electronic form submission available for use, such as the Certificate for Veterinary Inspective. This bill is a common sense step forward that will keep costs down.

(Opposed) None.
